Rodent They use their sharp incisors to gnaw food, excavate burrows, and defend themselves. Rodents are native to all major landmasses except Antarctica and a handful of isolated oceanic islands — though humans have since introduced them to nearly all of these places too. Most rodents are small animals with robust bodies, short limbs, and long tails. Most eat plant material, but some have more varied diets. dogs were a food source for the Navajo people, while gophers, squirrels, and rats were eaten by the Paiute. Rodents are widely used in animal testing. Rodents (from Latin rodens 'gnawing') are a group of mammals belonging to the order Rodentia (roh-DEN-shə or roh-DEN-chə) characterized by a single pair of continuously growing incisors in each of the upper and lower jaws. Rodents make up about 40% of all mammal species 2f772aae54
