History of Addis Ababa The central focus was the emperor's palace, which was surrounded by the dwellings of his troops and of his innumerable retainers. The middle class also introduced newly manufactured automobiles and expanded banking institutions. Subsequent master plans, formulated from the 1940s onward with the input of European consultants, focused on the development of monuments, civic structures, satellite cities, and the inner city.

In the 1920s, Addis Ababa experienced a significant economic upturn, marked by a surge in the number of middle-class-owned buildings, including stone houses furnished with imported European furniture. Urbanization and modernization persisted during the Italian occupation, guided by a masterplan aimed at transforming Addis Ababa into a more "colonial" city, a trajectory that continued beyond the occupation. In its first years the city was more like a military encampment than a town 8aa14828d9
