Roman ideas regarding the medical powers of water were, to some extent, influenced by ancient Greek tradition. Like ancient Greek doctors, Roman physicians maintained that hot or cold baths could help balance the humors of the body. Therapeutic baths were extensively promoted by the Methodic school of medicine, whose adherents included doctors such as the 1st-2nd century CE physician Soranus of Ephesus. Methodic doctors were known for frequently recommending pleasant treatments, which perhaps contributed to their acceptance of medical baths. It is likely that the prominence of bathing as a standard recreational activity helped motivate the popularity of medicinal baths amongst the Roman public.
