Who? d35f7e0929 Restrictions on Catholic worship were gradually reduced from 1845, but the ban on Jesuits was not lifted until Norway ratified the 1950 European Convention on Human Rights in 1956. In both 1897 and 1925, proposals to lift the ban on Jesuits were discussed and voted on, but failed to gain a supermajority in 1897, and only gained the support of a minority in 1925. Thus, this provision became the last important express... d35f7e0929

Hurston moved to Eatonville, Florida, an all-black town, at just one years old, where she resided until age thirteen when her mother died. Her family moved with hopes to seek better opportunities as African Americans, which they were able to do with Zora's father, John Hurston, being a pastor and eventually becoming the mayor of Eatonville. After the death of her mother in 1904, Hurston was forced to live with relatives in Jacksonville, Florida who were working as domestic servants. This new environment differed greatly in terms of racial hostility. At her new school, she faced high racial discrimination, which she references in her essay stating she felt, "most colored when thrown against a sharp white background". Eatonville and Jacksonville are the main settings of this essay as Hurston uses them to differentiate versions of herself and her feelings of both heightened and lowered social awareness.
