Social inequality is linked to economic inequality, usually described as the basis of the unequal distribution of income or wealth. Although the disciplines of economics and sociology generally use different theoretical approaches to examine and explain economic inequality, both fields are actively involved in researching this inequality. However, social and natural resources other than purely economic resources are also unevenly distributed in most societies and may contribute to social status. The slightly broader term "land recycling" is sometimes used instead. Detractors view increased urban density as overloading urban services, including increased traffic congestion and pollution, and decreasing urban green space. Infill also applies, within an urban polity, to construction on any undeveloped land that is not on the urban margin. Corrupted economies cannot function properly since the natural laws of the economy are distorted. As a consequence, corruption, for instance, leads to an inefficient allocation of resources, poor education, and healthcare or the presence of a shadow economy - which includes illegal activities and unreported income from legal goods and services that should be taxed but are not. 7b34a77150
