Predictive methods for surgery duration Therefore, SD predictive methods attempt, on the one hand, to reduce variability (via stratification and covariates, as detailed later), and on the other employ best available methods to produce SD predictions. scientific research related to scheduling methods addresses also SD predictive methods and vice versa. Durations of surgeries are known to have large variability Predictions of surgery duration (SD) are used to schedule planned/elective surgeries so that utilization rate of operating theatres be optimized (maximized subject to policy constraints). The more accurate the predictions, the better the scheduling of surgeries (in terms of the required OR utilization optimization). Durations of surgeries are known to have large variability. The tight linkage between SD prediction and surgery scheduling is the reason that most often scientific research related to scheduling methods addresses also SD predictive methods and vice versa. An example for a constraint is that a pre-specified tolerance for the percentage of postponed surgeries (due to non-available operating room (OR) or recovery room space) not be exceeded 3ad071f4a4
