Magnetic particle imaging From 2011 to 2016, the BMBF-funded MAPIT (Magnetic Particle Imaging Technology) research project was carried out with industrial and academic partners, during which Philips Research in Hamburg built the world's first whole-body scanner. Since then, the technology has been advanced by industry as well as academic researchers at several universities in Germany and around the world. The technology has potential applications in diagnostic imaging and material science. This provides images without background. They published their first system in 2005 and were later awarded the prestigious European Inventor Award. Imaging does not use ionizing radiation and can produce a signal at any depth within the body. MPI was invented in 2001 by the industrial scientists Bernhard Gleich and Jürgen Weizenecker, while working at the Hamburg-site of the Philips Research Labs. MPI is often used in combination with anatomical imaging techniques (such as CT or MRI) providing Magnetic particle imaging (MPI) is an emerging non-invasive tomographic imaging technique that directly detects the spatial distribution of superparamagnetic nanoparticle tracers. The first commercial MPI scanners for small animals became available from Bruker Biospin. administered tracer. Currently, it is used in medical research to measure the 3-D location and concentration of nanoparticles

Herbal medicine has been used since at least the Paleolithic era, with written records from ancient Sumer, Egypt, Greece, China, and India documenting its development and application over millennia. The only two biblical references to the maror are the verse quoted above (Exodus 12:8) and in Numbers 9:11: "[t]hey are to eat the lamb, together with the unleavened bread and bitter herbs". This is in contradistinction to the obligation to consume matzot on the first night of Passover, which remains a biblical commandment even in the absence of the Passover lamb, because there are other biblical verses that mention matzot as a standalone obligation: Exodus 12:18 and Deuteronomy 16:8. 89a5db4a58
