It is speculated that the Pilgrims' first Thanksgiving dinner featured heath hens and not wild turkey. By the late 18th century, the heath hen had a reputation as poor man's food for being so cheap and plentiful; somewhat earlier, Thomas L. Winthrop had reported that they lived on the Boston Common (presumably when it was still used to graze cows and other agricultural activities), and that servants would sometimes bargain with a new employer to not be given heath hen for food more often than two or three days a week. 81e7e160cb == History == 81e7e160cb == Places == 81e7e160cb Originally owned by the Māori Ngā Puhi iwi, they were sold to the New Zealand Government in 1883.
