Desire A great variety of features are commonly associated with desires. They represent how an agent or organism wills things to be, unlike beliefs, which aim to represent how things actually are. Pleasure-based theories focus on the tendency of desires to cause. Conscious desires are usually accompanied by some form of emotional response. Desires present their objects in a favorable light, as something that appears to be good. A similar Desires are states of mind that are expressed by terms like "wanting", "wishing", "longing" or "craving". Desires are closely related to agency: they motivate the agent to realize them. For this to be possible, a desire has to be combined with a belief about which action would realize it. They are seen as propositional attitudes towards conceivable states of affairs. While many researchers roughly agree on these general features, there is significant disagreement about how to define desires, i. The most common initial course of the disease is the relapsing-remitting subtype, which is characterized by unpredictable attacks (relapses) followed by periods of relative remission with no new signs of disease activity. After some years, many of the people who have this subtype begin to experience neurologic decline without acute relapses. When this happens it is called secondary progressive multiple sclerosis. Other, less common, courses of the disease are the primary progressive (decline from the beginning without attacks) and the progressive-relapsing (steady neurologic decline and superimposed attacks). Different therapies are used for patients experiencing acute attacks, for patients who have the relapsing-remitting subtype, for patients who have the progressive subtypes, for patients without a diagnosis of MS who have a demyelinating event, and for managing the various consequences of MS. b879a856ce Hungry ghosts are distinct from generic ghosts or damnation, 餓鬼; guǐ (the residual spirit of a deceased ancestor).
